ABOVE: This illustration, called "The Worlds", was created in Photoshop. It has a surreal texture made of small brushstrokes and pixel paint, and a texture gradient which renders it like nothing else. BELOW: A set of thumbnail images created using Adobe Photoshop Sketch for the iPad, the app enabling me to work — and collaborate! — directly with a corner of the final image. Updates show up in real time in this panel. ABOVE: A set of images created using the Adobe Photoshop Mobile app (on the iPad). The images have been created with a set of brushes and filters that appear in the tutorial, as well as in the app itself. BELOW: Another image that has been created using Photoshop Mobile. The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web. This has been possible thanks to the Wasm porting branch of the Blink project's WebAssembly implementation, which we introduced in 2017. WebAssembly is already present in Chrome and chromium, and it is a great solution to improve web apps that need to run efficiently. By combining WebAssembly and additional Wasm bindings , we can exceed performance limits of current web technologies. By looking at early reports and observing how people use Photoshop in the web, we can understand how to apply these approaches to future generations in the browser. Since the release of the WebAssembly porting branch, the development has focused mostly on Blink, and contributions have been given mainly to stabilize and improve implementations of WebAssembly. As of the release of the public beta, the development planning has shifted to porting Photoshop as a test case for WebAssembly. The work so far on the new project has focused on the following areas:Performance Optimizations The primary goal of the test, which is a full implementation of the web version of Photoshop in WebAssembly, is to compare the performance of a portable version of Photoshop to that of Photoshop installed on a native machine and confirm the performance ratio of web vs. native application. This is required to ensure that the performance is reasonable for a well-optimized web application. In the work so far, we have analyzed the impact of the new platform implementation of WebAssembly, added new resources, and optimized various language runtimes and frameworks, such as WebAssembly.js and Web Workers. 933d7f57e6
